I have a library called libfoo.a which depends on libbar.a and libbaz.a. My final application must be linked to libbar.a. However, libfoo.a must be built with libbaz.a instead of libbar.a. libfoo.a has a flag -B (or -b) that lets me specify the libraries to be searched for dependencies, however the flag -Wl,--verify-library-resolution, also exists. The flag -Wl,--no-verify-library-resolution does not exist. I have discovered how to turn off the flag with -Wl,--no-verify-library-resolution but how can I turn off the flag -Wl,--verify-library-resolution? I cannot compile libfoo.a with both libbar.a and libbaz.a because they both must be used. A: The --no-verify-library-resolution and --no-external-library-path flags are there because the linker has no way of knowing that a library is available when you pass its name to it in the link command. The --verify-library-resolution flag is there to force the linker to use a previously-linked library with the same name, even if the name was not actually passed to the linker. This is important if you're linking to a shared library that was linked before you started your program, but if you have both the library and the program linked, it's redundant. There is no way to stop the linker from verifying the dependency. There's a
